 Existing literature on social justice pedagogies tends to focus on theory rather than practice, while studies that do examine classroom applications of social justice pedagogies primarily center on the social sciences, particularly in secondary education. Therefore, the purpose of my research is to investigate how professors of literature apply social justice pedagogies in the post-secondary literature classroom in order to raise critical consciousness and actively engage students’ understanding of literature as a powerful form of social action.